Title: Live with MND, live with independence

Motor neuron disease does not have to rob people of their independence.

Tunstall Healthcare provides a range of solutions to assist people living with motor neuron disease to maintain their independence for as long as possible.

A personal alarm can be installed in the home, allowing the resident to make quick and easy access to their carer or a 24 hour response centre.

A 24 hour response operator will organise the assistance the resident requires, such as a family member or carer, ambulance to be called or for an after hours GP to attend.

The operator will also stay on the line until help arrives.

An alarm call for help can be activated via the button on the personal alarm or wireless radio trigger that is worn around the resident's neck while they are in the home.

For people with more advanced motor neuron disease, an alarm can be triggered using a puffer switch, pneumatic switch, proximity sensor or wand switch.

Each of these activation solutions requires very little effort; such as breath, slight pressure or very light touch.

However, if none of these activation devices suit the individual, a custom solution can be created.

Tunstall also provides a fall detector which automatically detects if the user falls over and is unable to get back up within 15 seconds.

A range of other sensors are available to detect activity or inactivity in designated areas of the home, as well as environmental factors such as smoke and flooding water.

These various sensors can provide a complete care solution and safer living environment.

Tunstall's telecare and customised solutions allows people living with motor neuron disease to maintain their independence as long as possible while providing peace of mind for their family and carers.
